Found upto a depth of 300 metres, fluor is derived from fluorite, a halide mineral known for what came to be recognised as fluorescence.

The base design, in two tones, reflects the absence of the typical isometric cubic form of the mineral, with veins of colour woven through.

Found in the Earth's continental crust, quartz is typically a transparent, six-sided, pyramidal crystal of extremely high purity.

Bespeckled with numerous quartz crystal forms in subtle tonal variations, the intricacies of this carpet are brought out by the duality of the silk.

A tetragonal crystal system, which changes colour with heat. The name zircon is derived from 'Zargun', which is Persian for 'gold-hued'.

The mineral's lustrous quality is marked by the dual property of silk, the interplay of two primary tones, and a series of fractals in the second layer.

Emery is a dark rock consisting largely of the trigonal mineral corundum, which is resistant to weathering and abrasion.

The design is analogous to the crystalline form of corundum as the base and a granular envelope of emery rock over it, enlivened by the silk weave.

Mainly consisting of strontium, Celestine is a rare crystalline mineral that also occurs in fibrous forms, and in minute living organisms.

Layers of striations on the surface and a graded multi-tone silk effect reflect the curvature and depth of this delicate mineral.

An octahedral system, Galena deposits hold significant amounts of silver, making it a precious mineral.

The design emulates the structure of the mineral and references the argentiferous constituent, marked by a distinctive form and a silken texture.

I was a thread once and then I found my way

I was a stitch once with so much to say

I wove together
all the warmth you seek

every inspiration,
every poetic streak

I am your escape
I am your flying carpet

I am your mind's eye
and the hands
beneath your feet
